

Steven Green is a third-year Ph.D. student in the History Department at the University of California, Santa Cruz. His dissertation research focuses on the intersections of U.S. Jewish life, community, and food in the Midwest, and explores the critical importance of food in various iterations as it pertains to these midwestern communities. His work often traverses history, incorporating elements of critical food studies and cultural anthropology, and takes an encompassing approach to studying the Jewish experience in the Midwest, making transregional and transnational ties. In addition to this research, he is also working on a project that investigates the history of transient, circuit-riding rabbis in rural U.S. Jewish communities in the nineteenth and twentieth century.
